The thesis examines how much stimuli is necessary for a space to meet our needs. Within the given parameters, the individuals are responsible for the shaping of the space. Architecture demands strict codes to ensure the health, safety, and welfare of its occupants. However, flexibility of space is also important to society because individuals respond better to different environments. By designing just the basics, buildings remain progressive instead of a product of the times.